McDonald's Hamburger University - the "Harvard of the fast food"

Founded in 1961 by Ray Kroc to teach the secrets of McDonald's

McDonald's Hamburger University is considered to be the Harvard of the fast food industry - and it's easy to see why. Founded in the basement of a McDonald's restaurant in Elk Grove Village, Illinois, the prestigious Hamburger University has grown extensively. Today, more than 5,000 students, hungry for knowledge, graduate from the program where they learn about the restaurant's operations, service, quality and keeping it clean.

McDonald's first grillman Fred Turner and the company's first CEO Ray Kroc founded Hamburger University in 1961. University's first class was composed of just 15 students. That number has increased considerably in recent years, with new campuses opened in Tokyo, London, Sydney, Munich, São Paulo and Shanghai. China's Hamburger University is so exclusive; it has a one per cent acceptance rate - a higher percentage than even Harvard. (...)

McDonald's American Hamburger University is still situated in Illinois in the town of Oak Brook. The university gives work to 19 full-time professors from around the world and with the help of interpreters, they can teach in 28 languages including Spanish, German, French, Japanese and Mandarin Chinese.

Enterprising employees are trained for specific career paths, be it crew, restaurant managers, mid-managers or even executives (...) Every McDonald's manager is required to go through the training.

Last year was the 50th anniversary of Hamburger University, and so far, more than 270,000 McDonald's employees have their degrees in delicious.
